"She is an intoxicating and unmissable cocktail of power and vulnerability."

Storm Large is a singer, actor, author and playwright whose unique charms and remarkable voice are quickly creating a space within the performing arts world that has been awaiting such an iconoclastic talent. Born in Massachusetts, yet honing her skills in rock clubs up and down the West Coast, her voice has taken her from the crummiest of dumps to the stage of Carnegie Hall in front of The Detroit Symphony, with conductor Leonard Slatkin.

"She was sensational in a Brecht-Weill experiment of dipping country innocence serially into urban decadence and seeing what comes out. What came out here was personality plus...and her voice came through the subtle miking fetchingly."
